Cyber Attacks: A New Threat for Europe

Brussels, 09.03.2026 [ENA]

Cyber attacks are becoming an increasingly serious concern for European governments, companies and public institutions. From critical infrastructure to financial systems and public services, digital networks are facing growing threats from hackers and cybercriminal groups. Experts warn that cybersecurity will become one of the key challenges for Europe's stability and economic security.

Cyber attacks have become one of the most significant security challenges facing Europe in the digital age. Governments, businesses and public institutions are increasingly dependent on digital systems and online networks for daily operations. However, this growing digitalisation has also created new vulnerabilities that can be exploited by hackers, cybercriminal organisations and even state-sponsored actors.

In recent years several European countries have reported cyber incidents targeting energy networks, hospitals, financial institutions and government systems. Such attacks can disrupt services, steal sensitive data or cause significant economic damage.

Experts warn that cyber threats are evolving rapidly as technologies become more complex and interconnected. Attacks can originate from organised criminal groups seeking financial gain, but also from geopolitical actors attempting to destabilise institutions or gather strategic information.

For this reason European governments are investing more resources in cybersecurity, digital resilience and international cooperation. Strengthening cyber defence systems and improving protection of critical infrastructure will likely become a central priority for European security and economic stability in the coming years.
